Communication App to Manage Symptoms and Improve Adjuvant Endocrine Therapy Adherence.

This study tests the use of a web-enabled app that is integrated directly with patients' electronic health records, with and without tailored feedback. The app-based intervention is designed to improve patient-provider communication outside of clinic visits, resulting in improved symptom management and adjuvant endocrine therapy adherence among diverse patients with hormone receptor-positive breast cancer. We will evaluate the impact of the intervention on a comprehensive set of outcomes, including rigorous measures of long-term adherence, quality of life, and costs.

Budget: $2,021,260

Role: Co-Investigator

Pending Grant Support

Alex and Rita Hillman Foundation Innovation in Care Program (submitted 6/2021)

Nurse-driven, shared decision-making intervention to increase genetic testing among Black women with early-stage breast cancer by facilitating patient-provider discussions about racism-related testing barriers. The goal of this study is to design and evaluate the acceptability, feasibility, and short-term efficacy of a shared decision-making (SDM) intervention to increase Black breast cancer patients' engagement in shared decision-making processes about genetic testing and improve oncology clinicians' skills in patient-centered communication about racism-related genetic testing barriers.
